The memory of the men and women, her sons and daughters, who have linked their names with hers, helped to form her ideals, bring to pass her achievements and make her name known to the world, should be treasured as jewels, nor, indeed, should they be hidden away between the unturned pages of musty historical records, but set in the appropriate matrix of the living imaginations of the present generation. Richer would be the lives of the men and women of the Yarmouth of to-day were they better acquainted with the men and women of the Yarmouth of yesterday. With a more loving zeal would they believe in and work for the future of their town did they realize the worth of its past. We fear that our sketches of these personages have been but clumsy; brief and circumstantial they were of necessity,...
